The invention of the match was, in common with most others, one born out of necessity. There had for centuries been a need for a portable means of creating fire, quickly and easily. Societal changes in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, such as greater mobility and the extension of tobacco usage, made the need for a convenient ignition mechanism all the more pressing. After the invention of a match product that was capable of commercial exploitation, during the first half of the nineteenth century, it took only twenty years for the match to reach a stage of product development that would remain practically unchanged throughout its life. The manufacturing process that was developed soon after the invention of the match has also remained much the same, although with considerable advances in mechanisation.

Despite its British birthplace, it was Sweden that became the dominant force in the match industry, and this is still the case today. Sweden had abundant supplies of the necessary raw materials and, it seems, had at the time the necessary collection of entrepreneurs and inventive engineers.
